6 Questions to Ask When Crafting a Winning

Customer Loyalty Program

Why start a loyalty program?

ou might be wondering if a loyalty program is right for your business. While it takes some work to set one up properly, the rewards aren't just for your customers-they are for you, too. Check out these four great reasons to get your loyalty program off the ground.

- Returning customers spend 67% more than new customers, and are 50% more likely to try new products.
- Customers that are engaged with brands and their loyalty programs purchase 90% more frequently, spend 60% more per transaction, and are five times as likely to choose the brand in the future.
- Acquiring new customers is 5 to 25 times more expensive than retaining the customers you already have.
- 90% of consumers aged 18-29 are willing to share personal data with a brand in exchange for free products or rewards.

How do I choose the right program format?

How do I choose the right program format?

There are three types of loyalty program formats to choose from, each with its own pros and cons, depending on the specific type of business you do and the goals you have for the program. Even within mobile app loyalty programs, there are choices to make.

Punches–Your classic buy-9-get-the-10th-free, frequency-based program

Punch programs are easy for customers to understand, cheap to run (all it takes is some printed cards if you don't want to go mobile), and easily tiered for increasing levels of purchase behavior. Downsides of not using a mobile app include requiring customers to bring their card, needing a custom stamp or punch to avoid program abuse, and missing the opportunity to collect customer and purchase info. If you are using an app, this is often a great entry point when constructing a new loyalty program.

Points-Customers earn a specific point value based on purchase amount

It's also easily understood by customers: spend X dollars, get Y points. It's also easily tiered for customers to achieve even greater rewards for greater purchases. And, it's consistent; program rewards may not change, even if prices do. Downsides include a greater effort to manage, as the store has to keep track of points for customers, and it lacks instant gratification, as this type of loyalty program makes buyers wait the longest to achieve a reward.

Cash-back-Customers earn money back to spend on future purchases

Customers love cash, and accruing cash back is a great way to make them feel good about frequenting your business. Requiring them to spend the reward at your business helps drive customers back for more potential sales. And, it's simple to understand: spend X, get Y back. Downsides include a long, potentially expensive wait for reward, as generally cash-back rates are low. And, for infrequent visitors, this type of program has little appeal, again, due to the long wait for the reward.

How do I bring my team on board?

How do I bring my team on board?

While smart business owners know that their employees are some of their greatest assets, they're even more important when launching a loyalty program. The success of any loyalty program starts with the business owner because it's up to him or her to properly lead, train, and motivate employees to push the loyalty program during each and every customer interaction.

To get your team up to speed on your loyalty program, it's imperative that you:

Demo the app or software with your whole team

Gather your team for a meeting and have them all download the loyalty app to their phones. Then have them practice checking themselves in like a customer would. It's helpful to see how the process works from both sides of the counter. Or, if you're using loyalty software, walk through the platform in your point of sale system to show how to set up a new customer or track purchases.

Make sure they greet customers by name

One of the greatest advantages of today's loyalty programs is that most are smartphonebased. That means when a customer checks into the program upon entering the store, their customer information is there on the point of sale. Never fail to use this to your advantage by training employees to frequently check the loyalty program check-ins, enabling them to greet each and every customer by name.

Make sure customers are presented with the opportunity to become members every time

If a customer hasn't checked in and the cashier isn't able to greet them by name, then they should be ready to pitch the program during the transaction. Signups are the lifeblood of any loyalty program, but customers aren't going to find their way to it on their own. Ensure your employees are trained to introduce it to every customer.

Train staff on overcoming objections and answering frequently asked questions

Customers will come up with any excuse not to join your loyalty program. That's why it's important to practice responses for common signup objections and train your staff on how to overcome them. There may also be a handful of questions customers will ask again and again. Anticipate them and make sure employees know how to respond to them in a professional manner.

How do I launch my program?

How do I launch my program?

You've picked a program and trained your staff-now it's time to launch. While day-to-day signups are the gas that makes loyalty programs go, getting the word out prior to launch will help ensure your customers know what you're offering and how they can get in on the fun.

Be sure to try:

Offering a juicy signup special

Set the tone for your program and make it too good for them not to join by offering a special reward for signups. Announce a promo before launch, and give customers who opt in to receive email a double reward once it's go time.

Promoting everywhere

Prior to launch, make sure your customers know what's coming. Place signage in-store, schedule social posts, add a message or link on your receipts, or drop a card into carryout bags. Your customers may be more likely to take an interest in your loyalty program if they've already been exposed to the idea.

Making a day of it

Everyone loves a party, and a rewards program is a way to celebrate your customers. So why not combine the two and make an in-store event out of your loyalty program launch? Decorate, offer cake and punch, and play music to make it a festive event. Customers will ask what all the hubbub is about, making it the perfect time to pitch your program.

What should I focus on once my program is up and running?

What should I focus on once my program is up and running?

While launching a loyalty program is a great first step towards using rewards to bring in your regulars more frequently, it's only just that-a first step. Lasting loyalty success lies in creating a solid foundation of core membership for your program.

Remember, Rome wasn't built in a day and neither are the best loyalty programs. To reap the greatest rewards, it takes a full-on effort over the first thirty to sixty days to lay the groundwork for a lasting loyalty program.

To give your loyalty program the solid foundation to thrive beyond the initial excitement of the kickoff event, try these proven strategies:

Race to 100

Since Clover Rewards was born, we've seen programs both fly and fizzle, and those that soar are the teams that enroll at least one hundred members. As businesses reach the century mark, they start to see a noticeable change in customer behavior that really affects their bottom line positively. To get the first hundred to join, create a group leaderboard for your employees and give them an exciting incentive for achieving this important goal.

The carrot of competition

While a group incentive is a great way to motivate the whole team and keep the excitement up across your whole staff, it's important to reward your best employees just like you plan to do for your best customers. Create an award for the team member who signs up the most customers to your program in 30 days, and set benchmarks and talk up competition frequently to build excitement. Call out the standings at staff meetings, and make the announcement of the winner a big deal at the end of the month. Remember, excitement is contagious and starts at the top, so be sure to keep the energy up over the course of the month.

Up the ante

As the first month of your loyalty program draws to a close, don't be afraid to introduce even sweeter incentives if the top employees can beat their original goals after 60 days. This extra jolt of excitement can drive competition among the leaders of your group and keep energy up through the end of the contest. After the initial period, consider renewing the competition quarterly to give your program the occasional enrollment boost. How do I get the most out of my loyalty program in the long run?

How do I get the most out of my loyalty program in the long run?

Launch parties are great, and madcap competitions are fun team motivators, but the businesses with the best loyalty programs are those that have found a way to integrate them into the very fabric of their day-today processes.

Loyalty is not a thing that happens once and then it's over; it's the thing you do every day to show your customers you value their business.

To grow the kind of loyalty that really lasts, try these ideas:

Perfect your pitch

At launch, provide staff with a brief script explaining your program and its value in a compelling way. Then, once your team has been promoting the program for some time, have team members who've shown the most success in signing up customers discuss how they've customized the pitch to make it their own. Make pitch practice a regular segment of your staff meeting. As everyone learns from everyone else, the whole team will improve and your program will grow.

Recognize VIPs

Encourage your staff to recognize your—and their—best customers, and make sure they go the extra mile when one comes in. The top tier of your program should be a worthy thank you to the people who support you day in and out, so make sure that you show them you appreciate them both in person and in the program, every time they come through your door. They'll welcome the extra attention.

Dial it up with data

The beauty of mobile loyalty programs is that they make it easy to understand who your best customers are, what they like, how they prefer it, and how often they come through. Be sure to take advantage of the analytics any good loyalty program provides and use that intelligence to create specials and regular offerings that speak to the things you've learned.

How can I reach loyal customers who may have strayed?

How can I reach loyal customers who may have strayed?

You may know who your most valuable customers are, thanks to your new loyalty program. But without their contact information, there's no way to reach them should they frequent your business less than they used to.

Luckily, today's point-of-sale systems offer great technology like Clover Promos, a program designed to make collecting customer info and contacting them on behalf of your business a natural, causal process. Most customers won't even notice!

Promos automatically collects customer contact info to build your mailing list. What's more, you can send real-time promos directly to them via email, text message, or your loyalty app AND post those promotions to Facebook and Twitter with a single click.

And when customers begin to stray, Promos can trigger a win-back campaign that will have them skipping mom's place to have dinner every Sunday with you. Reaching your most valuable customers has never been more convenient, which makes Promos a great solution when your VIPs need a reminder of why they love your business so much.
